More recently, companies have relied on thoughtful layouts to support employees' need for mobility. Quieter spaces with more calming color tones may be just what a programmer needs to focus on a challenging coding issue. A social zone with modular furniture can cater to small break-out groups or larger team meetings.

Support wellness.

In recent years, companies have paid more attention to employees' well-being-including their mental health. That's led to a raft of workplace benefits and initiatives aimed at supporting healthier habits, happier workplace environments, and more. Most professionals expect this support: 83% of employees say it's important for their employer to create spaces and programs that address employees' mental health. Flexible scheduling-whether in the office or for remote work—continues to top the list of benefits employees want to see. Workplace design elements such as quiet spaces in the office and access to natural light also are among employees' top five requests for wellness support. Lighting, says Cho, is a crucial design element that companies shouldn't ignore: "Yes, it's aesthetic, but there's a real function there, too," he says. "Lighting is very important for productivity and it can even change [employees'] moods.

Different types of work

Make your office a place where people want to spend time

Think holistically about the types of work your company's varied teams do. Chances are, each needs some combination of privacy for deep work; space for calls, teleconferences, webinars, or other communication or collaboration; areas where small groups can huddle for brief meetings or brainstorming sessions; spaces where larger groups of people can meet without disrupting others.

"Your office is just one part of a network of places where work can be done. Make sure you design your office with this context in mind, and don't just think functionally by department. Think about the varied nature of work, and how to create attractive environments for different types of work,"
